The organisation of the Passport Department had not yet become perfect, and the packed rooms at the French Consulate in Bedford Square, where one could wait hours without apparently making any progress, were a perfect nightmare to the faint-hearted. Of course, one can rightly argue that assimilation and association were both long terms objectives and that the colonial power either direct or indirect was fundamentally centralized. He does mention once, late in the book, that he does often have to squelch feelings of superiority because of his degree.
